

A finial is an element marking the top or end of an object, often formed to be a decorative feature. In architecture it is a decorative device, typically carved in stone, or hand-made steel employed to emphasize the apex of a dome, spire, tower, roof, or gable or any of various distinctive ornaments at the top, end, or corner of a building or structure. Where there are several such elements they may be called pinnacles. Smaller finials in materials such as metal or wood are used as a decorative ornament on the tops or ends of poles or rods such as tent-poles or curtain rods or any object such as a piece of furniture. These are frequently seen on top of bed posts or clocks. Decorative finials are also commonly used to fasten lampshades, and as an ornamental element at the end of the handles of souvenir spoons. In days gone by, finials were rumored to stop witches from landing on your home. Hence the popularity of finials during the middle ages.
